There is no continental equivalent to the analytic philosophy of religion industry, with a large number of practitioners and a standard list of topics to be discussed. One will look in vain for much discussion of the proofs for the existence of God, the problem of evil as a counterproof, the divine attributes, the evidential value of religious experience, and so forth. A triple sampling of the rich diversity of philosophical reflection on religion and on the relation of philosophy to religion within "continental" traditions. The first part explores three accounts of the relation of phenomenology to religion as presented by Heidegger, Ricoeur, and Marion (in relation to Janicaud's critique). The second part explores Heidegger's critique of metaphysics in its onto-theological constitution with detailed attention to just what he means by this notion ...
